Henry Furman, the aviator, during his American visit seemed as much impressed with the primitive proportions of some of New York's flats as with the height of her skyscrapers or the immensity of her hotel bills. "I visited a Brooklyn aeronautical experimenter the other night," said Mr. Furman to a reporter, "and his flat was the smallest I've seen yet. It showed me the point of a joke I once heard an American make I laughed then at this joke, which I had heard two years before. "Smith of Brooklyn" I said to my American friend, "doesn't strike me as at all literary, and yet he declares he only feels really comfortable and contented when snugly ensconced in his library?" "Well, you see," my companion explained, "Smith's bookcase is a folding bed."
